Abstract

The 30 per cent quota mentioned in Law No 12, 2003 (Law on General Election), to some extent has encouraged Indonesian women to be active in the political world. The slogan, vote for women, has been wide spreaded through seminars, fosters, stickers, and advertisement in the media. But, this effort was still unable to significantly increase women’s representation in the parliament. For East Java parliament, the 2004 election has resulted to elect 16 women out of 100 total members. Who are these women? What were the efforts they made to be able to sit in the East Java parliament? Could they really become women’s representatives? This paper aims to see the struggle and the strategies that these women made in order to sit in the parliament as well as to see their activities in this important political institution.
